

Notes in the Margins

Sometimes the answer just falls into your lap.

While cross-referencing my late master's journals for this military project concerning long-range scrying anchors, I found a marginal note in a familiar hand. Unindexed, unexpounded upon, a completely blasé observation about her surroundings. Which, knowing her, makes it all the more important.

"Silvered linework observed in dawn sky, southeast. Viewable via True Seeing Avoid staring."

I had always questioned why she built this tower here. I assumed it was geographically convenient for defense and obfuscation. But this changes things. Southeast places it uncomfortably close, there's only so much southeast before the ocean (which I assume to be treeless). It is too close to be coincidence, especially given what I saw through the astrolabe. The angles line up.

Did she know? Did she choose not to? I find myself irritated her omission of any more detail, but such was her way, obfuscate. A tower is not a casual investment, especially not for someone as deliberate as she. If this "silvered linework" is the same phenomenon I observed—if that tree truly exists in the flesh—then this place was never meant to be merely defensive, moreso a forward observational outpost.

As always I am amazed just how far ahead of her time she indeed became, it's a true shame what happened. I will begin triangulating the location tomorrow.