

Uncooperative Geography

Reaching the site has proven... educational.

Naturally my first attempt was a short-range teleport keyed to the astrolabe's projection, elegance itself. Unfortunately the spell landed me halfway up a sheer basalt rock face during a sleet squall, with something winged and territorial already screeching its objections. Bird lover that I am, I barely escaped with a few claw marks and a bruised ego. A mishap should have been impossible, but the tree, apparently, does not appreciate my conjurer's tricks. Poor taste, if you ask me, but that's neither here nor there.

Somehow flight fared worse. From the skies these foothills and valleys are a maze of overlapping ridges and deceptively dark rocky terrain. And no matter how carefully I followed my sextant, even with magical guidance, I made no progress. Thinking the limitations of magical flight was the primary limitation I even degraded myself into polymorphing into smaller more patient creatures, but this only extended the problem. The grove simply was not there. My sight slid off it like a lemming off of a cliff. I am familiar with one kind of magic that can place such a ward, but without finding the source I cannot use a targeted dispel. Despite my searching, I have yet to find the tome from which to transcribe my master's eponymous True Seeing spell. This week has truly been a waste.

It seems I must rely on the teachings of my ancestors, and just walk until I find it. Whatever their self-imposed intellectual limitations they were undoubtably peerless navigators. So if this grove wishes to be found, it would have to accept me on those terms.

I resent this immensely.